

Esperanto is a fascinating language with a considerable speech community in more than 130 countries all over the world. It is built up in a singularly logical way and has no linguistic complexities that do not contribute to the communicative richness of the language. These factors make the language between 5 and 10 times easier to learn compared to traditional ethnic languages. Such a language is singularly suited to international use.

Esperanto is a language with its own culture, created through 130 years by its dedicated language community. Hundreds of meetings have taken place and still take place throughout the world – local, regional, national, continental and global. Moreover, it is a valuable bridge between national cultures, especially those of lesser-spoken languages. The goal is to support these languages and to enhance the linguistic and cultural richness of our world.

Esperanto is a just language since it is at the disposal of everybody – not only those with the means, contacts and time to learn an ethnic language. It places people on an equal basis and gives everybody the chance of communicating across nations.

Esperanto is a language that opens the world to its learners and speakers. Many speakers have a basic and firm belief in international harmony and openness of cultural differences.

Esperanto – in short: a fascinating, culture-bridging, just and world-wide language.
